

Professor Pitsch's main research interests are in computational energy sciences. This includes combustion theory, modeling of turbulent reacting flows with large-eddy simulations, theoretical and experimental research in fuel cells, development and analysis of chemical kinetic reaction mechanisms, modeling of pollutant formation, development of numerical methods, investigation and modeling of combustion instabilities, and model applications to modern aircraft engine combustion, reciprocating engine combustion, and chemical processing.